[Book page on Amazon] — ” This is a collection that encapsulates the Black American experience throughout life and current times. It has been receiving local praise but I would like to spread the word even further.” Mr. Johnson says “People don’t have to fit a stereotype to express themselves as writers. All it takes is a willingness to listen to the world around you and a desire to convey what is happening in your mind into these things we call words. I have been writing poetry and lyrics since college. I write to release the angels and the demons that affect and afflict my being.”

Full story at <https://www.blacksoftware.com/press/>

Includes never-published, first-hand accounts of African American computer networking and Internet pioneers in Boston and beyond. Provides a historical look at the challenges of diversity and inclusion in computing industries. Reveals the previously untold collaboration between the federal government, the computing industry, and elite science and engineering education institutions to use new computer technology for the purpose of containing, profiling, and detaining Black Americans, beginning in the early 1960s.
